($1.8 \times 10 \times 10 \times 103 \text{ m}$) (0.1 m) = 0.1 m , Volume = $3.9 \times 10^4 \text{ dm}$) The centrality of music in the master's program is evident from this first question on the entrance exam, and the response itself, assigning music an important role in the formation of the student, is an appropriate appraisal of the course in an earlier lecture. The course is presented as a music course, however, in the following ways: As they point out that music is not a passive process but a creative one, the students are given the opportunity to explore the world of music through play in several different ways. Thus, a collection of instrumental pieces, some of them instrumental improvisation, provides a basis for an exploration of the possibilities of the relations between music and other domains of experience. The course also includes examples of music that represents its own original form of creativity, such as the Italo-Frucian operetta Carnival, and provides the students with the opportunity to analyze this form of musical self-expression in more detail. The students are expected to develop their own creative and musical faculties, rather than passively listening to music. There are some well-known theoretical concepts from a music history course that are used in this course, such as the notion of counterpoint (or at least some of its aspects) and the "feminization" of music. Thus, these concepts are explicated. The students are also introduced to the "concrete music," music for instrumental ensembles, music in form, including that of operetta, and the highly stylized music of chamber music. It is not until this point that the students have heard any particular music. Also, at this point the students are also given the opportunity to become acquainted with a specific body of music, the Symphonic Cello Sonata of J. S. Bach (BWV 1002), which is heard and played three times, once in its complete form, once in a version with one quarter of the texture, and once in an instrumental solo with its special features. At the end of the course, the students are given a final exam, which consists of an overall understanding of the course and the development of their musical capabilities, self-assessment of the course, and a question on the practical task of writing music of the title "Opus 1" that is indicated in the course. The question and task are presented as an opportunity for the students to make their own decisions 82157476af
